Excerpt from A Letter to the Viscount Folkestone: On the Unlawfulness of the Votes of Thanks to Mr. Wardle, and the Late Minority Three years have not elapsed since I had the duty of announcing to your lordship that, with the unanimous voice of all the electors of this city, you were returned by them as a representative of the commons of England in parliament. Of all the duties which I had to discharge in the tenure of a laborious and important office, there was none which afforded me a higher gratification than the business of that day. I thought that I was an instrument of public benefit in proclaiming the delegation of a personage of high dignity and character to assist in the legislation, and to protect the liberties of my country. I thought that the function which your lordship then accepted was national and independent. I knew that you did not enter parliament as an ambassador from the fifty-four persons whose suffrages had entitled you to your seat; I did not consider that to us...
